²⁰ jennet or jennah (جنة) Paradise, heaven. Mahomet knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come; he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high a regard for the sex to be guilty of so unpolite a piece of injustice: the idea originated from a verse in the Alcoran, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Mahomet upon the cruelty of the exclusion; when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Mahometans believe that there are eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity for the blessed; and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned; drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice.
²¹ ahli jennet The inhabitants of paradise.
²² jennet mekan Placed in paradise (a mode of speaking of deceased princes).
²³ jenneti aden The garden of Eden. The Mahometans assign three places for this terrestrial paradise. The first, near Damascus in Syria; the second, towards Obollah in the Arabian Irac or Chaldea; and the third, on a spot bordering upon the desert of Noubendijan in Persia, called Sheb Bouvan, watered by the Nilab; whilst others fix it at Samarcand. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Serendib or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam.

The word Ramazan implies a consuming fire, whence it is by some conjectured, that this month was formerly stationary in the most sultry period of the summer, and not revolving through all the seasons, as at present, in consequence of the Mahometan year being universally lunar. The Ramazans greatly revered on many accounts, but particularly from the belief, that it was on the 27th of this month called ليلة العدر (the night of power) that the Alcoran began to descend from heaven, on the anniversary of which all orthodox Mahometans continue most fervently in prayer, imagining that every petition then put up to Omnipotence will be favourably received. Ramazan is also ¹ One of the attributes of God, as the pardoner, and likewise the burner of sinners. ² Sand shining, or scorched by the reflection of the sun.

From year to year, every year. سال سال (or سال سال) The next year, the year to come.

¹ سال سال A year barren for want of rain —The epoch of the Persian solar year is of very high antiquity, then historians and astronomers generally carrying it up to Gem or Gemshad (p. 694) above 800 years before the Christian era. It consists of twelve months, of thirty days each, five days more being added to a particular month to make the number in all 365. For some time there was no embolism, similar to our leap year; in consequence of which, their Nauruz, or new year's day (p. 940), originally fixed at the vernal equinox when the sun enters Aries, unavoidably made a retrograde progression into Pisces; to remedy which, at the end of every 120 years, a month was intercalated, and celebrated with the greatest festivity all over the kingdom. This month, at the end of the first period, followed Pheravadin (March); at the second celebration it was placed after Ardebe- light (April), and on the third, it succeeded Kbe-dad (May); the five aleutitious days being always annexed to it. In this rotation, it continued till the year 636 of the Christian era, when Yezdeghird, III the last king of the Sassanid dynasty, being defeated and dethroned by the Arabians, Persia became a province of the great empire of the Khalifs; and the Mahometan lunar computation being introduced in all civil and religious affairs, the intercalations of the solar year were, from that period, neglected, till 1079, when the Seljukian sultan of Persia, Malekshah Jellaleddin (Emmull' Omia (p 239) to the khalif Moktadi) reformed the kalendar, which has since borne his name; bringing forward the Nauruz from the fifteenth degree of Pices to the first of Aries, and intercalating an embolusinal day every fourth year, which was thence called کسنه سال or leap-year. The astronomers, in their tables, add the five aleutitious days to the last month Izphudamas (February), though they are vulgarly annexed to Aham (October), because they happened to follow that month, in the intercalary rotation, at the defeat of Yezdeghird, who had made an alteration in the kalendar, known by his name, which however, in consequence of that event, soon ceased to be publicly attended to. It may here be observed, that the old Persian month was not divided into weeks, every day having a distinct name taken from the angel supposed to preside over it. See ماه

^{٥٩} Sikender Alexander. Two princes of this name are much celebrated in the East, (both distinguished by the title of زوالعزین Having two horns (of the world), implying that they conquered the globe from east to west; the first supposed to be one of their most ancient kings (see سیر الذهب); the other Alexander of Macedon, whom they call also Ben Filicos (son of Philip), and Rounu (the Grecian). Some Persian historians say, however, that he was not the son of Philip, but of Darab (Darius), who having married a daughter of Philip, fast her back, tho' pregnant, because he disliked her breath; that being delivered of Alexander at her father's court, Philip educated him as his son, and bequeathing him his crown with the secret of his birth, he laid claim to the throne of Persia, then filled by his younger brother Darius (by another mother), and supporting his pretensions with a powerful army, defeated him, and reigned as the tenth king of the Caraman dynasty; dividing his empire on his death-bed amongst twenty-four of his principal commanders, the chief of whom they call Lagos (Ptolemy). The Tarikh Montekheb relates, however, that he distributed his dominions in his life-time among the sons of those princes whom he had conquered, on the condition of their paying him homage as lord paramount, and furnishing certain quotas of troops; which terms they punctually complied with till his death, when each became independent in his feudal principality (If there are circumstances in these Eastern details inconsistent with truth, let it be remembered, that they are not more visionary than the legendary improbable fictions, which swell the Greek historians). The conquests of Alexander are celebrated in many Persian, Arabick, and Turkish histories, romances and poems, under the titles of Sikender namé (the Book of Alexander), Aineh Iskenderi (the mirror of Alexander), Beharistan (the mansion of the Spring), &c.

^{٦٠} fekender Name of a game.

^{٩١} fikké A die for coining, the impression on money. سکه دار Having power of coining, i. e. an independent sovereign. سکه زدن fikké zeden To coin. سکه زن fikké zen A coiner, the master of the mint. سکه روبه fikké rupee A ficca rupee, of full standard weight — There is a degree of magnificence in some of the Eastern coins, together with an elegance of fancy in the inscriptions, to which the Europeans have nothing similar. A mere accident having afforded me an opportunity some time ago of making a hasty transcript of one (struck at Delhi, A. D. 1653, in the reign of the Great Mogul Shah Jehan), which to me appeared to give weight to the above observation, I shall here insert a description of it, as it may to some perhaps be an object both of curiosity and information. It is of gold and circular, above 70 ounces in weight, nearly four inches diameter, and four lines thick; in value about 300l. Within the circle on each side is inscribed a square, (the angles in contact with the periphery) in which, and in the complementary segments, are the following inscriptions.

(1. Within the square on one side)

شهاب الدین محمد صاحب فراں بانی سہا
جہاں بادشاہ عاری

The bright star of religion, Mohammad, a second Sahab Keran, Shah Jehan, the victorious emperor. (Sahab Keran is a royal title, similar to Cæsar, Augustus, &c. It was adopted by Tamerlane).

(2. In the segment of the circle, on the upper side of the square)

سکہ بر مہر دو صد مہری زد از لطف الہ
The impression upon this coin, of 200 mohurs, (see مہر) was struck by divine favour,

(3. On the lateral segment to the left hand)

بانی صاحب فراں شاہ جہاں دس سہا
by the second Sahab Keran, Shah Jehan, the defender of the faith.

(4. On the bottom segment)

روی زرباد از عیس سکہ اس عالم بروز
May the face of gold, from the sculpture of this coin, enlighten the world,

(5. On the lateral segment to the right)

ما شود از بویو خورشید روس روی ماہ
as the splendid face of the moon is (illuminated) by the rays of the sun.

On the Exergue or Reverse.

(1. Within the square)

لا الہ الا اللہ محمد رسول اللہ — ضرب ۱۰۶۴
دار الخلافہ شاہ جہاں آباد

There is no God, but God, and Mahomet is the prophet of God. Struck in the palace of Shah-jehanabad (Delhi) A. H. 1064 (A. D. 1653)

(2. On the top of the square)

شد اہباں از صدقہی اسی بکر انور
Religion was enlightened by the truth of Abubekre;

(3. On the left hand compartment)

شد از عدل عمر اسلام قوی دست
The faith was strengthened by the justice of Omar;

(4. On the bottom compartment)

از شرم و حیای عنہاں دین بارہ شد
Piety was refreshed by the mildness and modesty of Othman;

(5. On the right hand compartment).

—————No name is more famous in the east than Solomon — he succeeded his father David, according to their belief, when only twelve years old; at which age, however, Omnipotence placed under his obedience not only mankind, and animals, but even the elements, and the Genii, good and bad. His throne was magnificent beyond idea, 12000 seats of gold being arranged on the right for the patriarchs and prophets, and 12000 on the left for men learned in every science. The birds were his constant attendants, screening him like a canopy from the inclemencies of the weather; whilst the zephyrs, wafting him wherever he wished to go, rendered horses or any earthly carriage unnecessary. — All the wonderful traditions however relative to Solomon, it must be observed, are not confined to the son of David. The heroic or fabulous ages of the Persians go far beyond those of the Europeans; the world, agreeably to their system, being peopled thousands of years before Adam, by ethereal or igneal beings, governed, by a succession of seventy-two Solomons. The supernatural powers supposed to be vested in those Antecadamite monarchs, as well as in the king of Judah, are figured to have been chiefly derived from the curious talismans they were said to have possessed, (to which allusions are often made not only in their poems and romances, but even in their grave works, and in the Alcoran itself) as the Khatym, or Mubur Solimani, the seal of Solomon; the Tigh atesh, or the flaming sword; the Jehel, or the impenetrable cunafs; and the Seper or the shield; which last they add was bequeathed by Jan ben Jan, one of the Antecadamite kings, to the father of mankind, who carried it to Serendib (Ceylon), where it was many ages afterwards discovered by Caumaias, the first king of Persia; from whom descending to his grandson Triahmuras, it was by that prince employed so successfully in his wars with the Druvs, that he got the surname of Dru bend, or chainer of demons. See دامبال — حان بن حان — دیو — بری &c. These, it may be said, are Persian tales; but let us not ridicule them; they are dignified by the Homer of Persia, Ferdusi, in his Solomon name, as the mythology of the ancients was rendered important by the Homer of Greece. Every age and every nation have their fooleries; many received opinions even of modern times will not bear the touchstone of truth; and the forcery laws of our own country are a far more authentick disgrace to human nature than all the wild yet pleasing fictions of the east.

(See مع).

They believed in one God, and in the ministry of angels, or inferior deities, as represented by the stars, which became in consequence high objects of their adoration. They held many tenets in common with the Mahometan, the Magian, the Jewish, and even the Christian religion, being by travellers called Christians of St John, because they adopted a species of baptism. Their chief pilgrimages were to Haran in Mesopotamia, to Mecca, and to the pyramids of Egypt, which they supposed to be the tombs of Seth, and his sons Enoch and Sabi, whom they considered as the founders of their faith. This was the principal religion of the Arabians before Moslemism, and is one of those tolerated by the Alcoran on paying a certain tribute to the prophet and his successors.

¹ صغري sa'ghra ¹ Syghan or Isfahan The metropolis of Gibel or Pejman Irak (the ancient Parthia). It is said to have been founded above 800 years before the Christian era, and derives its name, as supposed, from Ispahan or Sepahan (cavalry), that being the principal station for the Persian armies, which, in all times, have consisted chiefly of horse. It was before the reign of Cyrus the capital of the Persian empire; but Persepolis, Susa, Madan (Ctesiphon), and other cities having afterwards alternately shared that honour, it was not restored to its former dignity till the eleventh century of the Christian era, under the Seljukian dynasty. On the fall of that family, however, the dynasty of Mozaffarians (conquerors) attached themselves to Shiraz, which continued to be the seat of government till the elevation of the Sefi family in the sixteenth century, by whom, but particularly by Shah Abbas the Great (or the Cruel) Ispahan was rendered the most extensive and most magnificent city of Asia; since which period it has continued to be the favourite residence of the Persian monarchs. صغري sa'ghra ¹ A native Isfahan. ² (or صغري sa'ghra) A species of melody, peculiar to Isfahan, much admired in Persia, of a simple pathetick stile, and in some degree resembling the Scottish musick.

² Just, upright, sincere. ³ (pl. صغصغ) The best part (of any thing). ⁴ That part of the plunder which a general takes to himself before a division. ⁵ Large smooth stones. Sefy or sefi The surname of a dynasty of Persian kings (who reigned from about the year 1500 till the usurpation of Nadir Shah in 1736) so named from Imael Sefi, the first monarch of this house. The origin of the elevation of this family however must be traced to a private ancestor of that prince, called Sefie'd'din (the purity of religion), who was cotemporary with Tamerlane. He resided at Ardebil, in Media; where his reputation for virtue was so high, that he was visited by that conqueror, as Diogenes was formerly by Alexander. Tamerlane on this occasion was so charmed with his conversation, that desiring him to ask any thing in his power to grant, the sage pointed to a number of young Carmanian captives, (whom this scourge of mankind according to custom meant to sacrifice) on the first publick festivity, and requested their liberty they were immediately delivered to him as slaves, but the generous philosopher furnishing them with every thing necessary, sent them free to their native country. As they were of the first families in Carmanja, their sense of his benevolence found no bounds, they were constant in their attentions, and magnificient in their gifts; a respect little short of adoration was paid to him; and it was chiefly owing at length to the attachment and courage of the descendants of that grateful Carmanians that his posterity mounted the Persian throne.

^۲ فریدون feridon The name of an ancient and celebrated king of Persia, the commencement of whose reign is placed about 750 years before the Christian era. His father (or grandfather) Gemshid, having been driven from his throne by an usurper, named Zohak, the people, after groaning under the oppression of this tyrant for several years, flew at length to arms, under the conduct of a blacksmith of Isfahan, named Gao, who, marching at the head of the insurgents, with his apron displayed as a banner from the point of a spear, gave battle to Zohak, defeated and put him to death. After this important victory, Gao dis-vering the retreat of the young Feridun, plated him on the throne; in return for which, that prince gave him, as a feudal principality, Isfahan, with the surrounding districts (known afterwards by the name of Parthia, now Persian Irak). The blacksmith's apron became from that period the great standard of Persia being from him named Dirfsh Gavani, (the banner of Gao). By Feridun and succeeding princes; it was richly ornamented with jewels, and lodged in the royal treasury; whence it was never carried to the field but when the king marched in person. It is said to have fallen at length into the hands of the Arabians, who found it amongst the other spoils of Yezdegird, the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, who was defeated by Saad, general to the khalif Omar in the year 636 of our era. See سال—Feridun is the boast of the Persians, as a model of every virtue; but his reign is so much disguised by fable, that, without placing confidence in the facts, we must only consider them as objects of popular belief. Khondemir, an historian of character, and the Tarikh Cazideh, gravely give him a reign of above five hundred years, which alone justly renders much of the rest suspected. The same length of reign is assigned to this prince, in a book of Persian Cosmogony called Bohun Deheh, written in the Pehlevi or old Persick, and asserted, by the Parfis of Guzerat, to be one of the works of Zoroastre; tho' part of it, at least, from allusions to particular events, must have been written since the seventh century of our era. Zoroastre is said to be one of his descendants.

¹³ fekyd Destitute, deprived.

¹⁴ fakyr ¹ A poor man. ² A religious order of mendicants thus named by the Arabians; by the Persians Dervish or Sof; and by the Indians Senafsey. In this singular class of men, who, in Hindostan, despise every species of cloathing, there are a number of enthusiasts, but a far superior proportion of knaves; every vagabond of abilities, who has an aversion to labour, being received into a fraternity, which is regulated by laws of an uncommon and secret nature. The Hindoos view them with wonderful respect, not only on account of their sanctified reputation, but from a substantial dread of their power; the Fakcer pilgrimages consisting often of many thousands of naked saints, who exact wherever they pass a general tribute; and their character is too sacred for the civil power to take cognizance of their conduct. The men they treat with little regard to politeness; but to the ladies they behave with infinite gallantry; the course of their pilgrimage being in general marked by a decisive cure of all female sterility. the former therefore, for the most part, abandon the villages on their approach; but the women, in seeming amazement at the terror of their male friends, undauntedly face this formidable host. The prayers of the Fakets are then solicited with much eagerness, and they are too holy to deny comfort to their fair devotees on these occasions however a slipper or a staff is always left as a signal at the door, which effectually convinces the husband, should any blunder unluckily direct him homeward, that his intrusion would be unpardonable, and subject him to a chastisement he seldom cares to hazard.—It is astonishing, at the same time, what tremendous voluntary penances these people impose upon themselves, to gain a superior influence over the people. Some suspend themselves by the shoulder blades to iron hooks; some stand from the rising till the setting of the sun, like statues on their pedestals, exposed in that sultry climate to all the influence of his scorching rays; some clench their fists till the nails, piercing their palms, appear through the back; some load themselves with chains, some gash themselves with knives; some hold their arms constantly perpendicular; whilst others twist their heads till they look directly backward. Every invention, in a word, of perverted ingenuity is exhausted in distorting and deforming nature; some, of the most elevated enthusiasm, striking off even their own heads, on great solemnities, as a sacrifice to the Ganges, which they worship if the nerves of the self-devoted victim are powerful enough to dismember it completely, he unquestionably goes to heaven; if not, his former sanctity is questioned, and his future happiness remains a doubt.—The Fakees and dervises in Arabia and Persia wear coarse woollen garments.

▲ كاف Kaf A fabulous mountain, anciently imagined by the Asiatics to surround the world, and to bound the horizon on all sides. In their writings, therefore, to paint the rising of the sun, they say, "When the star of day appeared from the height of Kaf the world was enlightened" whilst they express the whole extent of the earth, by, "ار كافي تا كافي From Kaf to Kaf." To account for the first or false twilight (called العمر الكارب), which is followed by an intenser darkness immediately before dawn (named العمر الصادق or العمر الثاني), the Eastern astronomers supposed a window in Kaf, some degrees below the summit, thro which the sun's rays being conveyed as he rose, the world after he had passed was left in temporary obscurity till he appeared again above the horizon. Since, however, some of their philosophers have applied themselves to the study of geography, they have discovered Kaf to be Mount Caucasus, or Imaus, to the east, and Mount Atlas, to the west; over which the sun, in those countries, appears to pass when he rises and sets. In the Alcoran (for even Mahomet was carried along by this popular belief) Kaf is said to rest upon a stone, called Sakbrat, formed, according to some learned doctors, of one entire emerald, the reflection from which, they say, gives the azure appearance to the sky; whilst its movements produce earthquakes, volcanoes, and all the extraordinary phenomena of nature. On Kaf the Eastern poets and romances have fixed the residence of the Dives or Genii, (supposing them to have been here confined by Tahmuras, and other ancient heroes of Persia) here too, they say, lies Fairy land; and here they place the city of Aherman (the principle of evil), where Argenk, a Genie king, they add, built a splendid palace, in a gallery of which, were portraits of the different kinds of rational beings who inhabited the globe before Adam. See سليماني — أهرمان — رئابل بن آدم — بري — دبو &c.

¹ كَمَر kemer ¹ The moon (especially from the 1st to the 26th day, the two first and two last days being called هَلَال). The old pastoral Arabians paid particular attention to the fixed stars, especially to those in the track of the moon's orbit, which they formed into 28 houses, dividing the Zodiac into 30 many equal parts, thro' one of which they reckoned the moon to pass every night. From a course of observations on those stars, and the angles they formed with the moon, in her various phases, the Arabians arrived early at a very great proficiency in foretelling the changes of the weather; whilst the regularity of their influence impressed them with such veneration for those stars, that they paid them a superior degree of adoration as subordinate deities. Thus, amongst other superstitions, was condemned by Mahomet. fate conduct — The Eastern nations are very curious in their paper, both in their books and in their letters, the most scrupulous etiquette being observed, when addressing great men, to send them precisely that sort of paper which custom has annexed to their rank.

To the king, the ground upon which they write gold, to nobles, and feudatory princes, it is generally ornamented with flowers or gold and other decorations; descending thence, through inferior rank, with a variety of gradations, both in quality and size, till it becomes either quite plain, or is powdered slightly with gold dust.

A great man may be flattered by finding him a paper superior to his dignity; but to err in the other extreme, is considered as an insult which he will not easily forgive.

Kāsh implies likewise a patent, presented by the kings of Persia to those whom they mean to honour; by virtue of which, the governors of every district, thro' which a Kāsh travel, must supply him, the moment he presents it, with carriages and every necessary, to which his rank is entitled.

¹ گاو or گاه Gao The famous blacksmith of Ispahan who defeated the usurper Zohak (see نبردون). The Caherman name assigns the following fabulous origin of this insurrection. The devil had long been subservient to Zohak, and at last, as a reward for all his services, desired only to kiss his shoulders; when immediately two serpents fastened on the spots where the demon had fixed his lips, and fed incessantly upon his flesh; the devil then told him, that the only alleviation of torment he could find would be the application every day of the brains of two men to the afflicted parts. The gaols were in consequence soon emptied, and the innocent then as well as guilty were daily dragged to death; till the sons of Gao having at length fallen victims to the tyrant's disease, the blacksmith flew to arms, and, seconded by the universal voice and power of the people, attacked and destroyed him. Khondemir, without taking notice of the devil, confirms the tale; and adds, that the gaolers, moved with compassion for their unhappy prisoners thus doomed to feed the tyrant's distemper, allowed many to escape, supplying the demand with the brains of sheep; and that from those fugitives, who took refuge in the Ararat or Gordian mountains of Armenia, sprung the nation known since by the name of Kurds. ^۶ Kiftafsi کفتافسی King of Persia (Darius Hystaspes) who flourished about 500 years before the Christian era. It was in this reign that Zerdust or Zoroastre introduced his theory of religion into Persia. He was greatly patronized by this prince, who built many temples to the sun, as the type of omnipotence the fountain of light. The visible representative however of the invisible duty soon engrossed the attention of the people, the sun and fire, which were apparently designed by Zoroastre merely as emblems of the Supreme Being, becoming alone the great objects of general adoration. The Sabean seems to have been the principal religion which prevailed in Persia previous to this period. See صبا

²¹ کدما kudma Chymistry, alchemy, the philosopher's stone. This word is supposed to be derived from the Greek zeugma, which signifies juice, humour, &c. and therefore it is confined properly to the extraction of the essences of plants. It is however extended also to preparations from minerals, metals, &c. but in this more enlarged sense they join it in general with fima (from سام veins of gold or silver), implying all the chymical operations performed by fire on animal, vegetable, or mineral substances. The Arabians had, however, another art called fima (from اسم or اسم a name), which was a species of geomancy or divination, employed by them in making talismans or charms, and in the invocation of spirits, for which purpose, in their books teaching this art, they had no less than twenty-eight alphabets of various characters, which they imagined, by certain combinations, had power to make supernatural beings subservient to the wishes and commands of men. ²² کدما kudma The grand alchemy, the philosopher's stone or tincture, of which they say مسطور الاسم و معلوم الاسم.
